People told us, "We think the world of staff" and "They really care". Relatives also spoke positively about the care people receive. Care staff support people's well-being by speaking with them in Welsh where this is their preferred language. Care staff support people to develop and maintain positive relationships with their community and with the people they live with.

Care staff support people to maintain their physical and mental health and emotional well-being. We saw care staff supporting people to take part in activities which promote happiness, health and social interaction. A dedicated activity coordinator works five days a week, including weekends. They plan and lead a range of meaningful activities people enjoy, including armchair aerobics, reminiscence sessions, board games, movie afternoons and dog therapy. They also spend one-to-one time with people when this is needed. Care staff know all people very well and demonstrate warmth and care in their approach. They continue to work in partnership with external health and social care professionals to support people's well-being.

Care staff prioritise people's well-being and safety by identifying and managing potential risks. The provider has effective systems to identify, review and address risks promptly. Care staff complete personal and environmental risk assessments and review them regularly. Care staff support people to have control over their day-to-day lives and to make decisions that affect them. Safeguarding and whistleblowing policies guide staff practice and help protect people from harm. The manager promotes an open culture where people and staff can raise concerns confidently.

People live in accommodation that meets their needs. Care staff and the provider maintain a homely, clean and well-kept environment throughout the service. Bedrooms are comfortable and communal areas are spacious, giving people places to spend time with others or enjoy quiet time.

Care & Support — Good

Care staff place people's health and well-being at the centre of the service. The provider works well with external health and social care professionals to meet people's needs. We saw this in care planning records and heard it during discussions with visiting health care professionals. They told us, "Care staff are excellent, they know people very well" and "They work very well with us". We saw care staff support people to attend and take part in health checks.

A full-time activity coordinator arranges regular health and well-being activities, including light exercise sessions. Care staff personalise health information to reflect each person's current circumstances and keep useful historical information available to support care delivery. The experienced chef manager knows people well and provides nutritious, balanced meals. Staff follow specialist dietary guidance with support from relevant professionals.

Care staff use strengths-based personal plans to support people to achieve their well-being outcomes. The provider gathers useful information from professionals and others involved in people's care and support. People's plans consistently include their preferences, routines, interests, life history and important relationships. Personal plans and risk assessments give care staff clear guidance about how people wish to be supported. Care staff told us they found this information helpful and easy to follow. The provider reviews personal plans regularly. However, reviews need to show more clearly how people achieve their outcomes and how people, or their representatives, contribute to the review process.

Care staff support people to receive medication in a person-centred way that promotes choice, individuality and independence. Care staff store medication safely and in line with requirements to maintain its effectiveness. Care staff who administer medication are competent and have completed relevant training. A clear medication policy supports staff practice. Medication records were generally accurate, although care staff had not always recorded when people refused "when required" (PRN) medication. The manager plans to introduce additional medication audits to address this. Overall, care staff manage people's medication safely.

The provider keeps people safe through a strong approach to safeguarding. Care staff receive good training, work within an open culture and understand the Wales Safeguarding Procedures. Staff complete individual and environmental risk assessments consistently. The manager records and analyses accidents and incidents to support learning and identify any patterns or trends.

Environment — Good

People are protected as far as possible from the risk of infection because staff keep the premises and equipment clean and hygienic and follow very good food hygiene practices. Care staff showed good knowledge of infection prevention and control and wore appropriate personal protective equipment (PPE). Training and clear procedures support this practice. Staff store potentially hazardous chemicals securely and keep the relevant safety certificates in place. Experienced domestic staff maintain a very clean and hygienic home. The kitchen has a Food Standards Agency food hygiene rating of 5, which means very good.

People live in an environment that meets their needs. The provider offers good private and communal space where people enjoy spending time. People told us, "It's a lovely home" and "I like living here". We saw personalised bedroom areas and pleasant communal spaces with good quality furnishings. People can use a range of communal and private spaces to spend time alone, socialise or entertain visitors. Several people enjoyed spending time in the reception area, where they socialised and greeted visitors. There is also a pleasant, safe and secure garden which people enjoy. Visiting professionals spoke positively about the home and told us, "It's a real homely home" and "It's always lovely and clean". We discussed the requirement for bilingual signage throughout the home with the provider. Staff maintain equipment, including manual handling equipment, and keep the relevant safety certificates in place.

The service provider ensures the premises comply with current legislation and national guidance on health and safety, fire safety and environmental health. We found the environment well maintained throughout, with relevant safety certification in place for electricity, gas and water. The provider needs to complete some environmental checks, such as water temperature and smoke alarm checks, more consistently. Staff complete simulated fire evacuations at different times, but the provider needs to record these. Overall, the service has good fire safety systems in place, and all staff have completed fire warden training.

Leadership & Management — Good

The service provider uses robust selection and vetting processes to recruit suitable staff. The provider completes pre-employment, and recruitment checks before staff start work at the service. Care staff complete a thorough induction, including shadowing experienced colleagues. Care staff spoke positively about working at the service and the induction they received. They told us, "It's a really positive place to work, I was made to feel very welcome" and "Had a good induction, helped me settle into my role". We saw the provider complete routine checks to make sure staff remain fit to work at the service and maintain appropriate professional registration. Overall, the provider's policies and procedures are appropriate and proportionate to people's needs. We discussed minor updates to some policies with the provider. Care staff understand the policies and described how they guide their roles and responsibilities.

The manager promotes a positive, inclusive and compassionate culture at the service, with good oversight from the Responsible Individual (RI). The manager is accessible and works alongside care staff in the delivery of care. Staff told us, "The manager is excellent so supportive" and "They really care about us". People told us, "The manager is very good" and "They listen". A visiting health professional told us, "They communicate very well". The RI visits the service and staff; people and visiting professionals know them well. The RI maintains effective oversight through quality monitoring systems, including quarterly and six-monthly reports.

The service provider ensures enough suitably qualified, supported and trained staff are available to deliver good quality care and support. We found staffing levels were good, staff turnover was low and the service had a stable and experienced staff team. Care staff receive training and support that reflects the individual needs of people living at the service. The staff team share information consistently through twice-daily handover meetings, and the manager provides regular supervision. The manager needs to reintroduce annual staff appraisals and more regular staff meetings. We discussed this with the manager, who told us they will prioritise this work.
