Findings:

Well-being — Good

People living at Parklands generally experience positive wellbeing outcomes and are supported in a calm, respectful, and person-centred environment. During the visit, people appeared relaxed and comfortable within their surroundings, and the overall atmosphere of the home was peaceful and welcoming. Interactions between staff and residents were consistently warm, kind, and respectful, with staff demonstrating a good understanding of people's individual needs, preferences, and routines. There was clear evidence people were supported to maintain their independence wherever possible, particularly through the reablement approach embedded within the service, which focuses on enabling people to regain skills and confidence following a period of illness or hospital admission.

Feedback from residents and families was largely positive, with many commenting on the caring nature of staff and the supportive atmosphere within the home. One family member told me, "Mum is so much better off in here; she is making progress every day." People reported feeling safe and well supported in their day-to-day care, and there was a sense of trust in the staff team.

Families spoke positively about their ability to visit freely and maintain regular contact with their loved ones, which is an important aspect of maintaining emotional wellbeing and social connections. Some individuals expressed a desire for more information and communication, particularly in relation to their future plans and returning home. This indicates people want to know more about what will happen next, despite care being supportive,

Records reviewed indicate people are involved in their personal plans and goal setting, reflecting a person-centred approach to care delivery. Reablement outcomes are often achieved, with evidence of increased independence in areas such as mobility, personal care, and daily living skills. Families reported feeling included in care planning processes and valued as part of decision-making. People spoke positively about spending time in the community with their families and expressed satisfaction in returning to the home afterwards.

Opportunities for meaningful engagement are present; however, these are not consistently structured across the service. While people are supported during care activities and mealtimes, there is limited evidence of a consistent programme of activities outside of these times. This can lead to periods where people are less engaged or stimulated, which may impact their overall wellbeing over time.

Care & Support — Good

People at Parklands receive care and support which is generally safe, effective, and centred on individual needs. Staff demonstrate a good understanding of residents' requirements and provide care in a responsive, respectful, and compassionate manner. A reablement-focused approach is embedded for those who require it. People who are living at the home on a short-term basis are supported to develop daily routines, where appropriate, and are encouraged to regain skills, confidence, and independence, often with a focus on returning home. This approach supports individuals to achieve their personal outcomes and maintain as much independence as possible.

People who live at the service on a longer-term basis are also supported to maintain their independence. Observations during the visit confirmed staff support people with mobility, personal care, and daily routines in an appropriate manner. Staff interactions were positive and respectful, promoting dignity and choice, and people were supported at their own pace.

Feedback from residents and families indicates care provision is kind, consistent, and supportive, with most people reporting they feel well cared for. Staff demonstrated a clear awareness of individual risks and needs, including managing more complex conditions such as epilepsy, reduced mobility, and allergies. This includes proactive monitoring and appropriate responses to changes in people's health and wellbeing.

Medication management processes are in place, and staff demonstrate an understanding of safe administration practices. Previous audits had identified a number of errors in medication processes; whilst there is no evidence these resulted in harm, they highlighted the need for improved oversight and assurance of staff competency. The service has responded by introducing an electronic medication management system, which was being embedded at the time of the inspection. This system is intended to reduce the risk of error, improve accuracy in recording, and strengthen overall governance of medication practices.

Where appropriate, people are encouraged to manage their own medication as part of their reablement goals. This was evident for some individuals within the service and supports independence and confidence. For those self-administering, medication is stored securely in locked safes within people's personal living spaces, with appropriate risk assessments in place to ensure safe practice.

Risk assessments are generally comprehensive and reflect people's individual needs and risks. Staff demonstrate an ability to respond appropriately to changes in condition or circumstance, ensuring care remains safe and responsive.

Environment — Good

Parklands provides an environment which is safe, clean, and suitable for the needs of the people living there. During the visit, the home was observed to be tidy, well maintained, and welcoming, contributing positively to people's comfort and overall wellbeing. The atmosphere within the home was calm and organised, with staff ensuring communal areas were safe and accessible. Communal spaces were appropriately furnished, offering a homely feel, and individuals' bedrooms were personalised with belongings, supporting identity and a sense of belonging.

The service demonstrates compliance with key health and safety requirements. Records we reviewed confirm essential checks are up to date, including fire safety systems and drills, legionella monitoring, gas safety certification, electrical testing, and equipment servicing such as hoists and lifts. These checks provide assurance the environment is maintained safely and risks are minimised.

The home holds a Food Hygiene Rating of 5, reflecting high standards in food storage, preparation, and kitchen cleanliness. Infection prevention and control measures are established, and the service has demonstrated the ability to manage infectious outbreaks effectively, ensuring people's health and safety are protected.

The outdoor environment is generally well maintained and provides a pleasant and accessible space for residents to enjoy fresh air. The outdoor space was tidy and inviting, supporting opportunities for social interaction and planned activities.

Planned improvements to the building, including investment in infrastructure and energy efficiency measures such as the installation of an air source heat pump, were evident. This demonstrates a proactive approach by the provider in maintaining and enhancing the physical environment.

Assistive technology is available within the service, and there has been a clear effort to display equipment and provide information to support residents preparing to return home. This reflects the service's reablement focus and helps people understand options available to promote independence. While these resources are beneficial, there are opportunities to further improve accessibility and ensure all residents can engage easily with the information provided.

Leadership & Management — Good

The leadership and management arrangements at Parklands support people to achieve positive outcomes, promoting their overall wellbeing. The service benefits from effective organisational structures, governance systems, and robust oversight, contributing to a stable, consistent, and person-centred environment. These arrangements ensure people receive high-quality care which is responsive to their individual needs and preferences.

During the inspection, feedback described a positive and supportive staff culture, contributing to staff retention and continuity of care. Staff spoke positively about their working environment, with one member of staff stating, “The staff here are nice… really good team morale.” This demonstrates staff feel valued, respected, and part of a cohesive team. Another staff member stated, “The culture enables staff to work together confidently and provide effective care.”

Staff confirmed they receive regular supervision, training, and opportunities for professional development. One staff member told us, “I have loads of training… my line manager is keen to see me progress,” indicating a clear focus on developing staff skills and knowledge. This ensures staff are equipped with the expertise and confidence required to meet people’s needs.

Quality assurance processes are well established, including regular audits, monitoring systems, and structured documentation to support oversight and accountability. The Responsible Individual undertakes regular reviews and engages with people using the service at least every three months.

There is clear evidence feedback from people, and their families is actively sought, valued, and used to inform service development. Where improvements are identified, clear action plans are in place, demonstrating a commitment to continuous improvement.

The provider maintains appropriate policies and procedures, which are understood and implemented by staff and regularly reviewed to ensure compliance with current legislation and national guidance.

Robust recruitment and vetting procedures are in place to ensure all staff and volunteers are suitable and competent, with agency staff expected to meet the same standards. This helps ensure people are supported by a safe, skilled, and trustworthy workforce.
